

STEVEN W. LEWIS, MD,

has been appointed chief medical officer of IHC Health Plans, Inc. He will develop and oversee quality assurance and utilization control systems for Health Choice. He will also bring a medical perspective to long-range and strategic planning. Lewis was formerly medical director of the intensive care unit committee at Utah Valley Hospital, Provo, and the medical director of the respiratory therapy department. He is a board certified specialist in internal and pulmonary medicine. He received his medical training, including residency and fellowships, at the University of Washington in Seattle. He also holds a bachelor of arts degree from the University of Hawaii.

computer translation system.

They formed Automated Language Processing Systems, Inc. (ALPS). The computerized system is unique, Mr. Warner explains, because it works on an interactive basis with human translators. A split screen shows the document being translated from, for example, English to French. As the translator inputs the document, the split screen shows the source language (English) and the target language (French). If a word has two or more meanings, the computer offers the translator the opportunity to select the proper word. The computer can also be programmed to supply local idioms to more accurately translate the document.

IBM, Xerox, Hewlett-Packard and other multi-national corporations have purchased ALPS systems.

Looks like RL Warner Enterprises has another "winner" on its hands! ■
